Critical Theology and Catechesis: Educating in Both Directions

Jacob Kohlhaas, Loras College (Iowa), Facilitator

How do we as educators create classroom environments and class experiences that engage classrooms with mixed Catholic identity? How do we meaningfully confront waning religious literacy, hostility towards religion, and fundamentalism all within one room? When is the role of catechist appropriate? Where does criticism cross the line? And how do we make sense of our identity as teacher-scholars in the midst of it all?

Civic Teaching and Learning

Elisabeth Vasko, Duquesne University, (Pennsylvania), Facilitator

As institutions of higher education deepen their commitment to community engaged learning, questions have about the epistemic center and pragmatic implementation of this pedagogical frame. Traditional formulations of service learning have placed the university at the center of the solution to civic issues. Students go out to perform tasks as “quasi-experts,” leaving little opportunity for mutual critique. Not only does this pedagogical framework limit possibilities for social transformation as it suspends trust within and across the community, but curricula that examines civic issues apart from serious consideration of how injustice appears within university life itself also purport the false message of academic elitism and moral purity. By way of contrast, civic learning and teaching states that those who are closest to the civic issue have priority in naming the problem, its effects, and coming up with the solution. This session explores concrete examples of civic teaching and learning within undergraduate theology courses.

Contemplative Pedagogy

Anita Houck, St. Mary’s College (Indiana), Maureen Walsh, Rockhurst University (Missouri), Karen Enriquez, Loyola Marymount University (California), Facilitators

This workshop explores examples of how contemplative practices have been used in the classroom, and a discussion of the effectiveness and challenges of implementing them. There is evidence that contemplative practices can lead to the development of skills that help form our students into more effective and flexible learners. For example, skills learned through such practices, such as concentration or paying attention, can help with the problem of student distraction in the classroom. It can also teach them to focus on one project or activity at a time so that they are not overwhelmed with their course load, which could result in stress and anxiety. Moreover, practices that invite them to slow down and listen deeply to each other and to their professors, help form students not just as better readers but also as better listeners and therefore better learners. As Thomas Coburn argues, “All colleges in the country aspire to cultivate in their students the fundamental liberal arts skills of reading, writing, and speaking. But very few address the reverse side of speaking, that is, listening – listening to heart as well as head, and listening to the other individual or group, quietly, patiently, letting them have their voice uninterrupted, without trying to straighten them out. Contemplative education adds to the familiar list of liberal arts skills the skill of listening.”

Yet, at the same time, given that many of these contemplative practices come out of particular religious traditions, there are continued questions about how they are used – whether they are still connected with or detached from those traditions out of which they arise. Both approaches lead to their own sets of questions and challenges. These are some of the topics the workshop hopes to discuss.

Assessment

Timothy Hanchin, Villanova University, (Pennsylvania), Facilitator

This session discusses the issues raised by the February, 2018 NYT article “The Misguided Drive to Measure Learning Outcomes,” by Molly Worthen.
